Q: `let and adverbs are ambiguous in C++ 11` on return of `const` on class member In C++ 11 I'm getting the error on the following code: #include class A { int a = 2; int getA() { return a; } }; int main() { A a; const A &c = a; const A &c2 = a.getA(); a.a = 4; } Error: error: ambiguous overload for 'const A::getA' in 'const A a' note: candidates are: int A::getA() note: const int A::getA() Here it is I'm not able to see why A: C++11 and earlier had no way to control the behavior of const for a function return value. Those could be either reference or value, and return a reference always meant one should return a copy, but passing a value could easily lead to a dangling reference. C++11 introduces the concept of rvalue references, but to be fair, the wording is a little dodgy. "A function return value whose type is rvalue reference to T or a reference to a bound const rvalue reference to T" (source) seems to clearly specify a reference, with the const added by people thinking about the case where T = bool. However, what does that really do? std::move does it, and it has to. But it's a little strange to say that it "doesn't actually store a reference of getA()", since it's not that that's being returned, only a value of the appropriate type. I think a better wording would be "a binding of getA()", or something similar. Or, even better, what the section of the standard says. It does not say "the const qualifier and type of getA() are ignored for the purpose of const-qualified return value analysis". Field of the Invention Embodiments of the present invention generally relate to a multi-process software collaboration system. Description of the Related Art Many businesses rely heavily on technology to support their day-to-day operations. For example, there are typically

Q: Etymology of the words "shop" and "grazing" According to Merriam-Webster's Eleventh Collegiate Dictionary, shop has the following sense 4a: a place for conducting business or entertainment : a social setting b: an undertaking or activity carried on by more than one person Grazing has the following sense c: activity of grazing livestock I've always wondered how the words shop and grazing came to denote activities that a flock of grazing animals might do. A: Please note that "grazing" is not the same as "mowing". "Grazing" is the activity of grazing. "Mowing" is the activity of mowing. I believe the word "mowing" comes from the Latin "mulment", meaning "a mowing". of a provocation." TwinAir, which makes chilled air-conditioning systems, also warned in July that temperatures would rise from about 1-1.5°C on average, with "increased precipitation". The minister for the environment, Greg Hunt, has repeatedly said that climate change poses a "challenge" but not an "emergency". In November 2012, he described it as "a massive environmental challenge that has a global dimension and which we simply must overcome". Climate change and health In 2007, the World Health Organisation projected that climate change would contribute to 30,000 deaths a year by 2030. The latest report from the United Nation's Intergovernmental Panel on Climate Change (IPCC) predicted that there would be health impacts from extreme weather. These include heat waves, droughts, floods, bushfires, and storms. The report concluded that in some regions up to 10% of deaths are affected by the health effects of heat, and that climate-related changes to health would increase in future. But the IPCC report did not include infectious disease in its total tally of climate-related deaths, saying such diseases would occur with other climate-related effects, such as through increased spread of other diseases. The report did suggest that some of the most vulnerable people would be either elderly people or children. "We already see an impact of climate change on health. Several studies show that heatwaves and weather extremes have a clear impact on human health. For example, heatwaves have affected incidence of myocardial infarction, heart attack, stroke
