A retired diamond polisher, former chef, and ex-cop in Bakersfield, Calif., makes his living guiding rigs and tractors through the dusty roads of the Antelope Valley, often with the help of a pair of young Mexican brothers, who know the local terrain. Half an hour into the 15-mile drive, Mark Apodaca arrives at a dusty triangle of land no bigger than eight football fields, where a fence and barbed wire encloses what looks like a black hole. "Look at that," he says to his passenger, pointing to a single fenced-in plot of dirt a few feet by a few feet. "He built all these." Apodaca clears his throat, pulling down his jersey. "He's not going to be happy," he says. "We're going to go through a gate. I don't think he's going to be happy." The reticent nature of so much of the Antelope Valley's land is a common source of frustration for the sheriff's department, which recently dealt with numerous cases of theft and vandalism, the majority of which were found to be facilitated by friends and family. Many of the ranchers here are veterans, traditionalists who have owned their land for generations. They resent the newcomers, most of them immigrants from Mexico, who have snapped up plots and moved in. "I try to know my neighbors, but a lot of these people, they don't want to be known," says Jerry Mendez, a deputy sheriff who spent years policing the dry, dusty, high desert and has witnessed the tensions spiral. "A lot of these people are way out there. You don't know what goes on with them. They're scared of you. They're scared of what's going on in the world." Ranching has been a traditional way of life in southern California for over a century and a half. With the drought crippling much of the state, the land here became a fertile hunting ground for people looking to make a quick buck. And for people like Alberto Serna, who left Guadalajara, Mexico, more than three years ago with his wife and four children, it was an opportunity that could not be missed. Serna purchased a quarter-acre of land as a fledgling dairy rancher, and by January, he will celebrate a decade there. But things turned sour pretty quickly. Over the last six months, he has allegedly witnessed

HeyEveryone,

Recently I provide offline play mode for Elden Ring, though it's very simple. Old version 6.7 doesn't support offline play. You can imagine how frustrating it was. Luckily, when your Elden Ring update, you can continue to play even offline.

If you want to continue to play this campaign, you can follow the guide below. Due to some reasons, I've stopped updating version 6.7, so I've updated version 6.9. If you want you can stay up to date.

HowTo Install Offline Play version 6.9?

Step 1:Download and run the installation file (Setup.exe).

Step 2:Install it to the Adobe Flash Player folder C:\Program Files\Adobe\Adobe Flash Player

Step 3:Open the game, you can see “Settings” on the action bar. Click on “Part4”, then “Test Connection”.

Step 4: Turn on Auto Connection, and you can play offline.

Step 5:Enjoy!!

Of course, your experience about this issue may be not the same with mine, so you can do offline play with your own way.

I hope you like this new version.

To install, you can use the auto-run option.
