Microvascular angina: no improvement in outcome with disease-specific therapy. Microvascular angina (MVA) is a distinct syndrome of chest pain thought to arise from coronary microvascular dysfunction resulting in myocardial ischemia. The evidence suggesting a substantial disease-specific therapeutic impact of MVA has not been systematically evaluated. A large, international, multicenter study was conducted to compare disease-specific pharmacologic therapy for coronary microvascular dysfunction versus standard medical care. Of 111 study sites, 103 enrolled patients. At 12 months, percutaneous coronary interventance of a treatment difference between patients with MVA and those with cardiovascular risk factors, chest pain, or noncardiac chest pain. PCI was associated with inferior survival in MVA compared with the overall population (hazard ratio, 2.05; 95% confidence interval, 1.32-3.17). The lack of a disease-specific therapeutic benefit for MVA must be considered a negative trial result for this form of therapy.
