“HyperMotion Technology” enables players to move smoothly and fluidly, regardless of which angle or speed they are moving at, mimicking the very movements that their opponents do during real-life football matches,” said Alwyn van der Schueren, senior producer, FIFA Series. “A fluid and realistic movement system will impact the way players move on the field, the way they tackle and pass the ball. Players will be able to move more naturally, allowing their athletic movements to show while keeping the skills and emotions of a football match on the pitch.” While the goalkeeping controls have been tested and feel right, there is still a lot of work to be done in terms of making the rest of the controls feel like they belong, that match up with the type of game and gameplay we want. We want a game that is a simulator of real-life football, and that means that the controls need to follow this philosophy and be built in this way. We are looking at a possible solution that lets us get the best from the new technology while keeping all the feedback in place that we need. The technology we are using will be used in real-time. This means that the players will react quickly to the actions of their teammates and opponents, just as they do in real-life. In some situations, the technology will eliminate being blocked by an opponent, or swerving around him. But it will also mean that player collisions are not just a glitch in your game, but instead, will provide a challenge. When we start working on game content, it is important that we use as much data as possible from real-life football, such as aerial duels and other players’ contact with the ball. We want to be able to add in opponents’ player behaviours and headings into the real-life data. The data will provide a realistic illusion of the game world. It’s pretty clear that speed is the most important part of this whole technology. This is because the computer-modeled players are extremely realistic, but there will be some parts that simply cannot be represented by a computer. The top players are now faster and dribble the ball better. We won’t be able to simulate all this with the player models we currently have. The goalkeeping will look and feel great because it will be so accurate. That is good. If you want to get a slightly more authentic feeling of football

Read More...Predicting sports injuries using support vector machine and backward chaining. In this study, 10 injury mechanisms and 10 injury sites were tested in a set of 200 athletes with an average of 4.7 injuries per athlete. A ten-fold cross-validation was used to determine the accuracy of injury prediction in both the "training" and "testing" sets. The pairwise injury mechanism or site and injury were compared based on the Bayesian classifier to produce a ranked injury list. We used support vector machine (SVM) to develop a multivariable regression function of four potential predictors and used this to rank the top four predictors in the ranked list to build a Bayesian model of injury. For both the single predictor and the multivariable predictor, our models showed similar accuracy to that of previously published injury prediction models. These findings suggest that it may be possible to further improve injury prediction models by taking into account the effect of injury mechanism or site and injury severity.// This file was procedurally generated from
