When you marry your family into a large Italian real estate empire, you can relax a bit – you've pretty much got everything you need. This, however, doesn't mean you have nothing to worry about. Your family is so big and spread out that now you need a "manager" to help you with the day-to-day operations. Oh, and while your family is quite happy with the palatial estate they inherited, they're not really into the idea of sharing it with your brother-in-law. They're the kind of people who've spent most of their lives getting what they wanted, and they really don't appreciate the risk of losing it all when someone else comes along and makes a more attractive offer. This is the struggle you'll be facing in this digital version of Viticulture, where you need to be as economically efficient as possible. Tapping your family members who already work for you, you must win the hearts of the ones who have aspirations to take over. You know better than to alienate the one who has a head start, but you must also be as pleasant as possible to everyone else, or else they'll not only turn against you, but they will poison your wine. Win over everyone to produce the most quality wine and make your family the envy of all the other big shots in the area! Also, your neighbors will make some noise, so be sure to nip that in the bud too! Can you get away with playing "manager" long enough to get your children, grandchildren and great-grandchildren on board? Summary: Viticulture is a worker placement board game where each player has an Italian vineyard and has to be efficient enough to keep it all running smoothly. It's a game about relationships, communication, and mediation. The relationships between the five family members (you, your sister, your brother-in-law, your mother, and your father) are the basis of the game. You work your way up in the family and earn your own part of the land you inherited. But only if you win over every family member can your children inherit your land, and only when you win the trust of the
