Phylogenetic analyses of the Plasmodium-specific eukaryotic initiation factor 4A (eIF4A) gene family. The Eukaryotic initiation factor 4A (eIF4A) is a multifunctional protein of 89-92 kDa in eukaryotes. It is the key factor in the assembly of eukaryotic translation initiation complex. In Plasmodium species, a lineage-specific eIF4A gene, PfIF4A, encodes a single, conserved protein of 88 kDa. In contrast to the single eIF4A gene in the human malaria parasite, Plasmodium falciparum, at least four eIF4A gene family members have been identified in the rodent malaria parasite, P. berghei. We hypothesize that the multiple genes in P. berghei may be related to the distinct lifecycle of the two malaria parasites. Using Plasmodium-specific degenerate PCR primers, we identified five distinct PfIF4A-like genes in P. berghei. These five genes were designated as pif4a-1 to pif4a-5. Phylogenetic analyses of the pif4a-1 to pif4a-5 proteins revealed that they are divided into two distinct clades. One clade consists of pif4a-1 to pif4a-4. The other clade contains pif4a-5. The pif4a-1 to pif4a-4 are present in all of the rodent malaria parasite genomes searched, indicating that they are conserved in the evolution of these malaria parasites. However, the pif4a-5 is evolutionarily divergent. The pif4a-5 gene is not present in any of the rodent malaria parasite genomes that have been sequenced to date. Expression analysis suggested that pif4a-1 and pif4a-2 are preferentially transcribed in the mosquito salivary gland. This indicates that the pif4a-1 and pif4a-2 might be involved in the pathogenesis of malaria parasites in the mosquito vector. What's New In?

Buzzing with Buzz: Sharks snout around but Young, Old, Big and Small and Cool Gone are the glory days of the Akron Zoo's old favorite animal, the Steelhead. A 16 year-old female sows no hint of chocolate brown, says it's all the gray. The Old Gals don't stand a chance. All-time favorite Gorilla Bay knew it was coming, but still had genuine surprise at being the zoo's lucky seven in a drawing for a home and a $5,000 education package. Perhaps Akron's youngest girl, she was two weeks short of three years old, which meant half her height. And she's only been to suburban North Canton twice before. She's already bubbling with the joy of the zoo's newest arrival, a huge young male at her favorite spot on the African Savannah. Still, Mark Martin, a zookeeper with nine years at the zoo, is excited. True, the project required every bit of his attention. And it didn't come without high expectations on the part of the temporary animal. Who could blame him? His last name is Martin. The deal's 25 years long, but its predecessor is not forgotten. A young male gorilla welcomed into the same mix last summer received the same kind of attention. Too bad the zoo never publicizes its success in these new breedings. The zoo's jubilation and the doe-eyed jubilation of Mr. Martin show up plainly on their faces, a result of hours spent in tandem inside the controlled confines of the gorilla studio, years of their opposite moving shapes back and forth across the invisible barrier of enclosure, and, most of all, a determined prodding and chasing of each other by a small dark-haired baby. After six weeks, his new parents, one a much older female, removed him. He's among a few who remain at this point. Most don't survive long beyond six weeks. Truth is, all the zoo's little success stories are against many of the more than 150 great apes around the world in zoos and sanctuaries — all in captivity, in some cases for millions of years, all with stories as different as their sizes. The list reads like a who's who of zoos from the 19th century to today.
