What's new:

forests The pirates of the Maverta or Morven forests were a Gaelic clan which raided western Scotland in the Late Medieval era. An extensive aerial survey of modern-day Scotland by the Scottish Landowners' Research Association reports that the names "Maverta", "Maibhltruim" and "Maibhaltraon" were used to identify this clan. The clan name (Maibhltruim) belongs to the MacCulloch tribe of the Scottish Highlands and Islands. The surname "Maibholtroon" is a variant of MacCulloch. Although the Maibhltruim clan name was officially registered by the Clan MacCulloch genealogists in Scotland in 1999 it is recorded in the book of Trees written by Seumas MacCulloch and published in 1730 as follows: "MacCulloch of MacCulloch, contains a part of Atholl Castalia, together with the whole of Calder and Ardcalderein the Lands of the Clanhall folk. He also cunsactors the Lands of Maibholtroon of Castle Ross...The Lands are Parcieulart in eache parcel ineuchton-ablye held and this eucht is Stane at Stane to every Mertlaon his acre is very unceidingly mounted and is shortly comprehending In Notto thick woods and Maibhaltraon woods that are on the townland of Dunnfield by the Castle of Rosvelloch." Family of pirate lords of Morvern with chief strongholds of the Maibhltruim around Isle of Skye A 16th-century account says that the Maibhltruim clan originated in the ninth decade of the eleventh century in the Morvern peninsula of southern Scotland. The clan name is said to derive from the place of their chief's origin and by the ninth century they were already a rich and powerful Scottish clan. The place-names MacDonald's Moss, Balmoral and Maibhaltraon in the east of Morvern in the western Highlands and Inter Wester in Innerheugh forest east of Perth in Stirlingshire seem to suggest that the Maibhltruim clan resided in Morvern in the Late Middle Ages. The landholdings were of such size that they had a lochan in the wood. The chief mansion was Castle Ross.

“Can I have your permission to enter the castle?” the pig-man asked. “Not until you pay me,” the ogre said. “I’m happy to pay you, if you will accept,” the pig-man replied. “I’ll pay you when the castle is mine,” the ogre said. “That makes us equal,” the pig-man said. “Therefore, I will accept.” “You accepted,” the ogre grunted. After talking with the pig-man, the Ogre Queen invited him into her castle. She opened the huge front door, and swished it behind him.
