The development of its application is in the hands of a prestigious laboratory "Bioelectron", the brainchild of an eccentric engineer. The weapon has been designed for the implementation in the aviation and a unit of elite airborne forces is established. When it was first powered, the experimental rifle shot in one single shot as a barrage of high-frequency light, effectively obscuring any small marks. What's new in The Graffiti Creator:

Well, I was "monkeying around" with my story, and, again, trying to figure out what to do with what I have already started. Which is where I'm at. This is my opening chapter, with maybe 30 or so more to go. I'm not telling how I came to be in this location because it's just not that important. But it starts out with Gedda sending me to a dungeon to see if I might have a chance of saving some people. And I find that I do have a chance, but the organization I'm working for isn't all that happy with me. JHc Chapter Four In every dungeon there was always an overseer, a controller or enforcer, who ran the prison and oversaw the prisoners. Whether it was a bank job or participating in a murder-for-hire to launder money for a drug cartel, anyone interested in death and killing would go to the dungeon. And these overseers made sure not one of them didn't die... Melford was pleased with himself. He had just finished his job as an enforcer for the organization overseeing the dungeon where he was currently residing. He had just one last assignment in which to work, but did not want to use the last assignment as the reason for his escape. No, he had been thinking about it for quite some time, and it was time for him to leave. He had been working in the dungeon for quite some time now, as his job was to kill any prisoner who was so unfortunate to be sentenced to the dungeon, especially dangerous offenders. He had killed many, but he felt a sense of emptiness within, like a heavy burden had been lifted off his chest. He had once believed that being an enforcer was a necessary evil that he just had to do. But, no more. For the last few years, he had been more concerned with his education than his work, working only when he felt that he had the time. Melford had his work and his education at the same time, which was unique, because most people who worked in the dungeon primarily did one. He was no different, except that his work had taken a very interesting turn. He seldom had people to kill until the last few years, as he usually killed for the organization, mostly for money. Now, though, he was involved with something more personal to him. Melford was dressed casually, in a pair of black jeans,
