San Diego's carpenter bees are "fond of exposed nesting wood surfaces" including decks, trees and fences, said Kari Goldbach, an expert on the invasive species and pest management program director at UC Cooperative Extension in North County. Goldbach's research in San Diego County led her to recommend to arborists in 2012 that property owners and first-time buyers avoid purchasing homes in areas where carpenter bees are common. On Wednesday, a carpenter bee was spotted on a neighbor's roof in the Harbord area, the first such sighting she has heard of in more than two years. "I'm seeing them after two years where I can't find anybody," she said. "There was a building inspector who was saying he would recommend people not buy in those areas." The bee is an invasive species known for damaging homes, city signs and other property. It is not known whether it is usually found in San Diego County, but San Diego's Board of Public Works requested that the San Diego Association of Governments (SANDAG) take steps to eradicate it. "Tremendous damage is done on nesting materials," said Laura Silvies, SANDAG's invasive species specialist. "It's like a carpenter ant is moving in. It digs holes and the trees look really forlorn after (carpenter bees) are in." Last July, Pronghorn Foundation launched the Invasive Insect Passport, which allows residents to record sightings of pest invaders and report them to a database. Through 2018, there were 66,577 sightings of carpenter bees in San Diego County, including 1,830 in North County, according to the website. The most common locations were seen in the coastal and inland areas from La Jolla to Fallbrook, but sightings also occurred in eastern and western San Diego. The website urges residents to call pest management companies or local authorities if they see carpenter bees. The insects also can be removed or trapped with simple devices. The insect can be hard to spot because its yellow-and-black shell can blend in with bark, ferns and other garden debris. The larger male carpenter bee
