"In my work, I have taught several other people to use Photoshop, and everyone of them has been amazed by the possibilities this software has to offer." — ROBERT PAPER, PHOTOGRAPHER As a professional photographer, Robert Paper works on projects in the advertising world that require him to provide multispectral images and color separation for printing. Using the knowledge he has gained from Photoshop courses, Robert uses Photoshop for editing:

- Raw files to convert them to a more manageable size that will make them easier to work with.
- Color correction for white balance, exposure, and temperature.
- Workflow. Robert says he tends to focus on what he's doing rather than on the product; therefore, he shows his work to clients in a detailed spread sheet where he lists the name of each image and the adjustments he has made.
- Color accuracy, which is much more important for him than he thought it would be. For a professional photographer or graphic designer, Photoshop is a no-brainer. Because the importance of working with a powerful program is self-evident, an artist may be placed in a situation where one tool or another is the best option. The working relationship between an artist and a photo lab will greatly influence whether or not Photoshop is the right choice. Therefore, any interaction between a photo lab, an artist, and a photographer will be more or less successful based on the information shared and whether or not there are any obstacles that will prevent the artist from creating something that's worthy of the production environment and its prerequisites.

THE PHOTO LAB More and more photo labs are being merged into their larger corporate structures. When two or more labs are merging, one tool can work against the other. The best laboratories are those who understand the cost of artistic development and treat the artists' work as a vital and integral part of their business. Ideally, an artist will be introduced to the photo lab's process and the tools it uses as early as possible, so that he can make educated choices and be involved from the beginning. The benefits of working with a photo lab are severalfold:

- Quality printing is assured. The technicians' experience in delivering the printed product will result in the highest level of quality.
- Speed. The turnaround time for large format printing is fast, especially when compared to screen-printing, where a photo lab is able to duplicate a painted

The fickle optimists are rejoicing about America's resurgence. Why? The optimists expect the Fed to pull it out of the Great Recession when, in fact, the Great Recession was caused by the Fed. The optimists have faith that our debt-laden government and increasingly irresponsible financial sector won't send us down the road to bankruptcy and social chaos. The optimists are wrong. They are wrong about the real effects of QE-2 and wrong about the effect of our increasingly irresponsible economic and political policies. But perhaps more importantly, the optimists are foolish to believe that our current path — fueled by fast-rising food and fuel prices, a chronically anemic labor market, and a roiling economy in the midst of a weakening housing market — will get us to the promised land of laissez-faire capitalism. Virtually every economic indicator tells us that we're heading toward a double dip. And while I am no fan of Adam Smith or the work of his former pupil Ronald Reagan, I don't think that the real free-market Adam Smith would be happy with what we're doing today. To understand why, let's go back to Adam Smith and his insight into the positive incentives of the market economy. Smith believed that wealthy entrepreneurs and businesspeople

The Economist is doing the right thing. Last week it started a 'dumping' campaign by removing their membership of the bank, created in 2007. This is a noble move. Even so, the following comments in the Jan 8th issue of the Economist illustrate an ignorance of banking and the argument that we have decided to give the benefits of a charity without the obligations. We propose that the entire banking system be transformed to a form more like what we have today in Sweden, Canada and the Netherlands. It will be a kind of competitive network of not-for-profit financial cooperatives to which individuals belong and where everyone accepts common rules that are proposed by a shared body of directors. A healthy banking system must have healthy competition, but it must also respect the savings of the people who make it up. The present system has neither. Credit cards, mortgages and interest-free student loans are all designed to give banks room to charge customers more. It takes more than interest rates, and much more than that, to make a healthy financial system. The first step is to make banking a public utility, not a privilege. Comments This article is not just a little ignorant of how banks operate, but it is also inaccurate. The universal banks in Sweden, Canada, the Netherlands do not have "more than healthy competition." In fact, the net is that they have little competition at all, as their wholesale operations are blocked out to the big banks in the other countries that make up the Eurozone. In addition, the only competition that exists is that which is imposed on the banks by the governmental agencies that are in charge of the supervision of the banking systems. Nor can there be much competition in the discount market, or you would see many discount banks closing their discount operations, because they don't have a competitive edge over the bigger discount banks. Nor do Sweden, Canada, and the Netherlands have healthy competition in the mortgage market, especially in the U.S. The present housing market and the mortgage market in the U.S. are dominated by government sponsored organizations, especially Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac. A good source for information on the U.S. mortgage market is "Likewise, if you look at how much banks borrow, you'll see that they'd save a considerable amount if they had their capital ratios at levels similar to those in Sweden, Canada and the Netherlands. It's one of the reasons they don't:
