A device of this type is used to scan a two-dimensional surface, particularly to create an image from the relevant layer of the surface using a line modulated by the scanning light. A line scanning image is thus obtained. In order to create an image of the entire surface, the line scanning image is scanned repeatedly to obtain a two-dimensional image of the entire surface. One such device is described in U.S. Pat. No. 4,464,024. This document describes a system having a plurality of sensors disposed along a straight line. In this system, the same line is illuminated for each of the sensors. When the scanning image is built up sequentially, each sensor sees a different portion of the surface. Because all the sensors within a single line are exposed to the same portion of the surface, the light intensity received by each sensor is essentially constant, and the scanning image can be built up by a simple binary calculation of the output signals of the detectors. The line scanning image is formed by serially illuminating the line of sensors and measuring the light intensity received by each sensor. Because the light intensity incident on a sensor depends upon the density of light in the sensor field, which in turn depends upon the distance from the sensor to the illuminated portion of the line, a line scanning image only forms when a given surface is brought into alignment with the axis of the line of sensors. In practice, the system is designed to provide a line scanning image only if the scanning system is correctly positioned within the device; thus the line scanning image represents a three-dimensional geometry of the surface. The patent specification referred to above describes a linear array of line sensors. Such sensors generally comprise a number of light-sensitive points, of which a user can select which are to detect light incident upon the array and which are to detect no light incident thereon. This flexibility is achieved by adding additional circuitry to each point, which circuitry is arranged to receive a signal from the light-sensitive point; in some arrangements, the output of this circuitry is connected to the other
