2). Organizational sponsorship Also known as organizational sponsorship (OS), or corporate sponsorship (CS), organizational sponsorship (OS) is the practice of companies, organizations or government entities of giving money or in-kind support to a person or group to use a public image to promote a specific position or product. The practice is controversial, as critics argue that the "donations" are campaign contributions from corporations, and are therefore political spending that must be disclosed to the public. Organizational sponsorships are used in a variety of ways. They may appear in news articles, or on websites as part of a marketing campaign or public relations strategy. Motives and purposes Organizational sponsorships can be used to: Generate positive publicity for organizations or companies. Ensure that organizations are portrayed in a certain way to the public, regardless of their actual opinion. Motivate voters to vote in a particular way or to vote at all. For example, Republican candidates often use this practice to lend support to black Americans, who tend to vote Democratic. Provide direct financial benefits to a group. For example, a corporate sponsor may pay the salary for a radio talk show host, allowing that host to further the aims and objectives of the sponsor. Provide direct financial benefits to individuals. For example, a company may donate a bus or ferry to the Republican National Committee to allow for a rally in that area. Advertise products by providing funding for the advertisement. For example, if a cigarette company donates a billboard, it will encourage people to buy and/or smoke that particular brand of cigarette. Campaign for public office.
