The right doses of l-arginine, l-lysine, l-methionine and fish oil. Food compounds derived from soybeans and menhaden fish have been successfully used to support the growth of poultry on diets without added amino acids. Arginine- and lysine-rich plant ingredients can support broilers to full production, and feed trials have also demonstrated that arginine- and lysine-rich ingredients can maintain lean carcass weight with modest reductions of total lean weight. The arginine- and lysine-rich components in these diets have a synergistic effect when fed as a combination. This is most clearly observed in broilers on a diet without supplemental lysine. Broilers fed a diet supplemented with the monosodium salt of l-methionine from sulfur-containing ingredients, which replace methionine in a similar manner as do synthetic amino acids, showed no nutritional advantage over those fed the same diet supplemented with DL-methionine. Feeding broilers a diet supplemented with fatty acids from fish oil produced modest increases in muscle deposition and decreased kidney weights. It would appear that broilers may have a greater capacity to utilize feed-derived fatty acids than isomethionine, and that both the strength of these dietary factors and their synergistic interactions are more critical than is the quantity. The fatty acid composition of breast muscle is similar in fish oil- and soybean oil-fed broilers, but differences in deposition are discernible. These differences occur in a tissue
