There are many published articles on the use of different brain stimulation techniques in neuropsychiatry, but only few of these studies have been carried out in the treatment of neurologic motor disorders. Therefore, it was not possible to critically review the most relevant results from the published literature. Nonetheless, the use of transcranial electric stimulation (TES) of motor cortex in the therapy of parkinsonian disorders seems to be promising. The clinical benefit can be increased by combining TES with motor training. There are also encouraging results in the use of TES in the treatment of peripheral neuropathies and spasticity. In some cases TES led to an improvement in the paralyzing conditions, mainly in motor neuron diseases. In order to optimise the results of TES, basic research is needed to explain its mode of action and to optimise stimulation parameters. TES of the motor cortex represents a promising method in the treatment of neurologic motor disorders, but it must be combined with motor training and adjusted to the individual needs of the patients. The long term benefit and
