The West is committed to see-saw Iraq back from ISIS to a position where its neighbor with the largest economy in the region, Saudi Arabia, also turns against the regime. For this to happen, the main reason is that the position of President Bashar Assad and his regime in Syria is a significant obstacle to Baghdad's plan. There is a balance of power on the border, with Iraq as the ruling party in the area, relying on Syrian support and acquiescence. But under the new political balance between the two countries, the Syrian regime and its allies are trying to change this balance. By making a new twist to the argument of supporting regional stability by removing the threat to Iraq from ISIS (Daesh) and the reason for Iraq's support for the US forces in the region, Assad's allies are presenting the US with a new argument: support for stability in the Middle East requires the US to give up the war in Syria, and this is a positive consequence for the Iraq-Syria balance of power. If they don't give up, the US, which has an important economic interest in Syria and a cultural connection to the region, is facing serious consequences. Most of all, Tehran's role as a third party is making itself clear. The mullahs don't approve the changes that the US position is facing. In fact, they are warning Trump about the consequences of this position that is imposed on him. This is why; the
