applications for a key USDA national grant to fund agricultural research that can aid the department's efforts to monitor and reduce the impact of climate change. The Research Grants Program for Climate Change Impacts is part of the department's $7.5 million program to counter effects of climate change. USDA announced in June 2014 that it would begin accepting applications for the program. The department has produced a special page on its website to explain the program and provide help in applying. The Agriculture Research Service, a division of USDA, says other agencies including NOAA (National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration), EPA (Environmental Protection Agency), NASA (National Aeronautics and Space Administration), and the Energy Department also support some of the programs. "The research we will fund will help our country adapt to the realities of a changing climate by finding ways to improve the environmental performance of our crops, livestock and fisheries," Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack said in a statement.
