Association of adeno-associated virus type 2 with melanomas of squamous cell origin, but not those of epithelial origin. A number of human malignancies, including melanomas, are associated with an increased prevalence of adeno-associated viruses (AAVs). The AAV genome consists of non-recombinant integrated episomal elements. The objectives of this study were to determine the prevalence of these elements and to determine whether DNA from AAV was detected in human cutaneous malignant melanomas of squamous cell origin and in melanomas of epithelial origin. DNA from melanoma and non-melanoma samples was obtained from archival paraffin-embedded material and assayed for the presence of AAV sequences. This was followed by a polymerase chain reaction (PCR) for the recovery and sequencing of AAV sequences. The cutaneous malignancy cohort consisted of one cohort of 20 primary melanomas of non-squamous cell origin (MNP), and five cohorts of squamous cell carcinomas of the head and neck. The melanoma cohort consisted of two cohorts of 20 patients: nine melanomas of non-squamous cell origin (NMNP) and 11 melanomas of squamous cell origin (MSPC). DNA from AAV was detected in 70% (14/20) of MSPC and in 0% of NMNP. No amplification products were detected from any of the melanoma samples, suggesting that AAV DNA is not present in epithelial malignancies. Fighter pilots who have survived multiple missions in the same airplane may be able to answer the burning question: can you get sucked out? In the next part of our series on air combat illusions, we look at the phenomenon of getting sucked out of airplanes, the details of which were first investigated by scientist Neil Sonnenfeld, who conducted experiments in a modified fighter plane. He used highly accurate, computer-controlled film cameras to record the motion of the plane's canopy under various conditions, including take-off, vertical motion, turns, and turning to the ground. His work produced a trove of imagery that helped to paint a picture of the conditions under which the phenomenon occurs. The thing is, the theory is not entirely impossible. A gust of wind can hit the canopy, causing the edge to pull away from the frame, even as the canopy is pulling the pilot out from the back of the plane. So, even if the pilot never leaves the pilot's
