a few days later, kennedy turns the page. he reads the chapter about the power of literature, about how it can reshape our world. and he thinks about his life. about the way he came up, about those neighborhood barbecues where his father taught him how to rollerskate and his friends, about all the kids who watched kennedy in softball, the team that he played second base for. he thinks about his childhood hero, superman. how he inspired kennedy, who as a boy would lie in bed at night and imagine himself in the caped heros army. kennedy thinks about the time superman came to life in the man of steel, walked through downtown washington, d.c., and posed for photos at the white house and the capitol and the smithsonian. kennedy remembers how all of his closest friends from those days had supermans dirty sneakers and a backpack filled with comic books and superman lunchboxes. while reading the nigerian boyo and carla books, i was reminded of the similar boyo and carla stories i had read years before, and how comforting it was to come across those stories in print. such books, just like the classic eurocentric american and European texts and companies, which sought to educate and uplift Caribbean youth with stories of their history and culture, had also travelled to Trinidad by sea during slave trade times. But in those times, Caribbean people largely ignored European texts, not least because our own oral stories of our histories were so beautiful and moving and powerful that they had to be passed down from generation to generation without interruption, while European texts, which tend to be simplistic and narrow-minded, did not always adequately capture the beauty and truth of African culture. And while the authorities in the Caribbean at that time encouraged the creation of large collections of Afro-Caribbean literature and history, they did not necessarily see the need to publish such works. That changed in 1959, with the publication of C.L.R. James' The Black Jacobins, which in turn led to the publication of many other great books like the autobiography of Malcolm X and the autobiography of Marcus Garvey.
