The GSM library sends commands to devices over the SPI bus. All modem commands are sent as a set of commands to a command object. The command object is then sent to the device, which waits for a period of time before it returns data. The first step in using the GSM library is to establish a connection to the device on the phone network. The library can do this or send AT commands to the device directly. Either method requires communication over the serial connection on the SPI bus or USB port. Most operating systems only allow one application to access the serial port or USB port at a time. If the Arduino is the active device, it will automatically get access to the serial port or USB port.

When the Arduino wants to send or receive data to the device, it will automatically become the active device and take control of the serial port or USB port. If you want another application to become the active device, you can do it one of two ways: Start the ArduinoISR function with sleep mode, which blocks all of the other functions. Run the CTS pin of a particular serial port or USB port high. After the ISR is running and requests control of the serial port or USB port, it will take control. Sprint devides its 3G connection between PUKs and an optional unlocked SIM card. For example, the PUK can connect to the GSM network, and while not connected, can receive SMS messages, make phone calls, and access the Internet. However, unlocking the SIM card and inserting it in an unlocked phone allows you to use the same Sprint number on multiple devices - mobile phone, tablet, and PC. That means you no longer have to carry a separate phone number for each of these devices. It also gives you the flexibility to purchase an unlocked GSM SIM card, and use it to connect to an unlocked phone.
