Unless you need to accomplish some specific task, it's always advisable to use the latest version of Lightroom. Sometimes it's not as easy as you might think. The latest version of Lightroom 5.6 is full of new features and improvements. Here's a quick guide to use these new features. You can divide your day strictly into two groups: the time you spend looking at someone's photo (for this, you will almost always be using the Develop module, apart from when you are sampling images), and the time you spend editing. So, how do you change the way you use Lightroom? Not so long ago, I was in the middle of editing a large number of images. My expectation was that Lightroom would have finished and the images would be ready in under three minutes. Alas, three hours later, my entire holiday album still hadn't been edited. I don't recall having deliberately used up all of my time. But I did have a deeply interesting and lengthy conversation with my wife, the details of which I don't remember. Something had to change. So, the first task was to go and have a look at the most recent version of Lightroom, Lightroom 5.6, and see what it has to offer. And perhaps most importantly, how I could use these features to be more effective and efficient in my workflow. Photographers are often pretty good at editing their photos. So, it's fairly unusual to discover that your photo editing workflow takes a day. There are several factors that lead to this type of delay. The first is that you are relying on Lightroom to pre-process your raw images, and a good proportion of your time is waiting for Lightroom to do the job. So, how can you speed up and improve your workflow?
