En nuestra posicion de... .The present invention relates generally to commercial furniture, and relates more specifically to table and desk assemblies. In the past, table and desk assemblies have been comprised of a three-legged base unit, and several top units that are directly attached to the base unit by either a permanent fastener or a removable fastener. A typical table or desk assembly would comprise a base unit, several top units, and legs that are permanently attached to the base unit. One drawback to such past table and desk assemblies is that some assembly is required to permanently fasten the legs to the base unit, and to attach each top unit to the base unit. This is a time consuming process, particularly if the base unit is to be shipped from one location to another. In addition to the drawbacks described above, past table and desk assemblies have generally failed to provide a convenient means of storing the legs and/or top units after the assembly has been fully disassembled. This means that the customer is forced to store the legs and/or top units in an inconvenient place, such as the floor, or on the grass or street in front of their residence. Colon cancer is the second leading cause of cancer-related deaths in the United States. The natural history of the disease suggests that early detection can substantially reduce mortality, and one approach to early detection is to screen for aberrant DNA methylation. The colonic epithelium is very easily accessible and the DNA can be isolated without requirement of any invasive surgical procedures. To identify novel marker panels that can detect early neoplasia, as well as assist in cancer screening, we propose to study a cohort of patients (n = 75) who have polyps detected during a colonoscopy, and whose subsequent biopsies will be examined for aberrant DNA methylation. Each sample will
