Disappointingly, I have not seen much in the way of stability updates for Lightroom 5. However, I am told this could have to do with Lightroom's continued evolution. Although I have not noticed any new bugs in Lightroom 5, I was concerned when an issue I experienced months ago reappeared in Lightroom 5. I have discussed the issue on PhotoshopAdvice . I am not yet convinced that it is entirely Lightroom's fault, though, as the problem still persists in other applications: "After upgrading to Lightroom 6, I have to restart my computer for the new files to show up. I've also noticed that the same files used to show up in Lightroom 5 bug on the new computer, and stop showing up on the old computer. This happens with numerous images that I've been working on for months. I've also uploaded additional images from a catalog via Lightroom 6 to a Lightroom 5 catalog, but those images are not showing themselves in Lightroom 5. Additionally, the images new to Lightroom 5 have all of the date info all wrong. Any young images that I have imported in Lightroom 6 should be blank for date, and they all have data from Lightroom 5, but they are all in the wrong series and the wrong year." I usually take a pragmatic approach to software reviews. I either try to argue that the shortcomings are fine, or that the advantages can outweigh these factors. But you know what? Lightroom 5 has been a complete pain in the butt from the beginning. I have no experience with version 5.0 since I stopped trying to use it almost two years ago when it was in its early stages. Given the extent to which Lightroom is now integrated into the Apple iPhoto workflow, I would have expected Lightroom to have remained compatible with iPhoto libraries I had created years earlier. I had this real hope that Lightroom would become fully compatible with all of the growing number of document archive formats in the sslr community.
