Adobe is releasing multiple updates to Photoshop in the coming weeks for Accessibility Features. The Accessibility Update brings a General tab to the Info Window dialog that includes a system full-text lookup feature, live video playback tool, and a system magnification tool. The next section is a little biased as I use Adobe products myself. So, please excuse me if I complain a little about them in this section. Nonetheless, I will try to be as objective as possible. Since my experience is limited with Photoshop compared to Lightroom, I will continue to stick to this software for my photography editing. That said, this is not to say that I don't use Lightroom. I use both, as it gives me the best of both worlds and I can still edit my photos on Lightroom because the export function in Lightroom is much better than Photoshop. Lightroom also takes good care of the metadata that I've worked hard to import into my Pentax images. Actually, Lightroom could probably use a lot of improvements that would make the editing experience in this software more pleasant. Some of that could be done with the developer's own resources, but I think Adobe is aware of this. That's why other improvements, including the mentioned ones, made it into CS5, but were not implemented till CS5.5. The XMP sidecar file that Lightroom creates should be a requirement for all camera files. This could lead to a huge growth in the XMP ecosystem as well as to more powerful exports without having to lose all the data. Better, standardized exporting will lead to a more uniform use of all the software on the market. If Adobe has a will to make people happy, I am sure they will.
