Image: Screenshot of a panoramic image that was set to be print-sized at 20x30 inches. For every inch beyond that, it would become unpleasantly pixelated. There are other images available on this site that are about the same size. When we zoom in on the preview, it becomes more obvious why this wasn't possible. To create a new blank canvas, you go to the Adobe website, create a free account, log in, and then click the "Get Started" button. When you do this, you have the choice from a menu of locations to pick from, presumably to offer options to your geographic location since you'll need a subscription. The best bet is to pick the New York location because that's where I'm located, at least for now. It's possible, however, to pick a location in Canada if you were so desirous. After creating the canvas and doing some extensive editing, you need to go back to the Get App website and choose an application to open your files. The application that I chose is Bluemagic since my new page is a panorama. All of the routes that were available to choose the app are listed for you to choose. The next step is a picture-worthy call, "Choose the location file manager to open your files." You'll then be sent to a page where you can pick anywhere on your hard drive to bring them into the app. The last step before proceeding into creating a new panoramic image is to choose a format. I chose "Raw." The last step is to give a name to your new picture and then get it out of your computer and onto the web server where you have shared access to the rest of the apps on your computer.
